Dear George

Thank you for your letter of 26 January to the Foreign Secretary on behalf of a number of your constituents, [REDACTED]

[REDACTED] about the UK's Death Penalty Strategy. I am replying as Minister responsible for human rights policy.

Unfortunately, your constituents have been misinformed by Reprieve. The Government has not abandoned or de-prioritised its pursuit of the global abolition of the death penalty. The Government's opposition to the death penalty is clear. As the Prime Minister recently said: "We condemn and do not support the death penalty in any circumstances and that includes Saudi Arabia. We always make representations on the death penalty." This is part of the day-to-day work of diplomatic missions to all countries who retain the death penalty. Foreign and Commonwealth Office (FCO) Ministers take all appropriate opportunities to urge penal reform and the abolition of the death penalty with our counterparts overseas.

Through our human rights programme funding we work with civil society to promote abolition. Since the General Election, the UK has spent £600,000 on such projects. From 2016, the FCO is doubling its spending on human rights programme work to £10.6 million - its highest ever level - through the new Magna Carta Fund for Human Rights and Democracy. This will allow us to grant funding to a greater number of projects and we will welcome bids in support of abolition.

Our bilateral work with individual countries is underpinned by broader support for the rules-based international order and multilateral efforts towards abolition, including the UN's calls for moratoria. The UK's pledges for re-election to the UN Human Rights Council reflect this enduring commitment to promoting universal human rights.

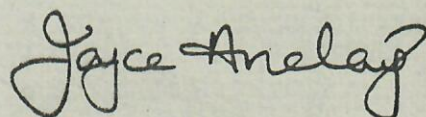

In response to the four questions which the Reprieve campaign poses:

1. Opposing the death penalty in all circumstances is already a firm, formal and explicit objective of UK foreign policy. We regularly make diplomatic representations in relation to death sentences that violate particular principles of international law.

2. We do not tolerate the illegal detention, torture or execution of British citizens anywhere. We take any such cases extremely seriously and use all means at our disposal to secure fair and human-rights compliant treatment for British citizens.
3. The Government's 'Guidance on Overseas Security and Justice Assistance' sets out a robust and sophisticated scrutiny process which ensures that UK security or justice assistance is only given once the risks of violations and abuses have been identified and dealt with.
4. There is no need to reinstate the country of concern status from previous versions of the Annual Human Rights Report as we have not abandoned that approach. Countries with serious human rights issues will be listed as 'Human Rights Priority Countries' in this year's report.

I am grateful to you for drawing to my attention the misinformation being promulgated by Reprieve. I hope you will reassure your constituents that the Government's position on opposing the death penalty has not changed. I have instructed my officials to engage with Reprieve to request that they desist from spreading incorrect and unsubstantiated material.

Yours sincerely,
